WHAT ARE COOKIES?
Cookies are small text strings that a website can send, while browsing, to the devices in question (whether this is a PC, a laptop, a smartphone, a tablet computer; they are usually stored directly on the browser employed). The same website that transmitted them can then read them and register the cookies stored on the same device to obtain various information.

HOW MANY COOKIES ARE THERE?
There are two main macro-categories with different features: technical cookies and profiling cookies. Technical cookies are usually necessary to ensure the website operates correctly and to allow for browsing; without them, the pages may not be displayed correctly or one may not be able to use some services. For instance, a technical cookie is essential to maintain the user connected to a website during their whole visit or to save the language or display settings, etc.

Technical cookies can be further divided into:

- browsing cookies, which ensure the normal browsing and use of the website (letting you, for instance, make a purchase or log in to access reserved areas);
- analytical cookies, similar to technical cookies only when they are used directly by the party managing the website to collect information in an aggregate form, about the number of users and how they visit the website itself;
- functionality cookies, which allow the user to browse according to a series of selected criteria (for instance, the language, the products selected for purchase) in order to improve the service provided to the user.
